I have a scenario where I want to change some code everytime I run the file so that there is no chance of old code executing. I don't want to save my old file everytime I run the code. I tried to do it with a timer and also DateTime and use that for timer and then compare both dates and change it everytime new data is added but I cannot get it to work because the hard coded file path and name always calls a file and not the data in that file. Any help in this regard would be appreciated. A: The reason your current approach doesn't work is because the file is being opened as read-only. Try setting the File.OpenModes property to include 'ReadWrite'. Then you won't have to hard code the file path. EDIT: As far as resetting your file data everytime, there's no need to do that. The file is being loaded to memory and can therefore be edited in memory without saving back to the file. The following is pseudocode. It just shows the general idea. string contents = File.ReadAllText(fileName); // The contents = the updated version of the file. // Do something with contents File.WriteAllText(fileName, contents);
