Well, like the traditional HDD, it will hold its data for only about 10 years. The major difference between these two portable HDD solutions is that the eSATA drive is more expensive than regular flash drives, and the internal one offers you much more space than the older flash drives that use the PC/AT interface. The latter commonly run at 150 GB, while the eSATA one will only add another 50 GB to it, putting the total capacity at about 250 GB. You can select the storage capability by choosing between 160 GB and 300 GB, depending on your needs. There is a solid casing for the drive itself, and there is a SATA connector and a USB socket. You can use a 5400 rpm hard drive, or a 7200 rpm one, if that suits your needs better. If the flash drive is operating under its own power, like the eSATA drive, you can use it for quite a while, as long as its battery still holds good. If you only plan on putting photos or similar things on the drive, it will do the job fine. The case is a little thicker than your usual flash drive, but the volume of 250 GB should help remedy
