In prior art, a method of printing a three-dimensional image by inputting a position detection signal based on detected position (for example, see Patent Document 1). According to the method described in the Patent Document 1, a printing position of the three-dimensional image is calculated based on the position detection signal. The position detection signal indicates the position of a surface of a subject. In the prior art, a method for a surface shape of the subject is determined in order to make the position of the three-dimensional image correct (for example, see Patent Document 2). The method described in the Patent Document 2 causes a three-dimensional image forming apparatus to obtain the surface shape of a subject based on the position detection signal by scanning the subject, detects the position of the three-dimensional image from a variation amount in the surface shape obtained by scanning, calculates the position of the three-dimensional image, and forms the three-dimensional image based on the position.
