The changes in the brain imprint of adolescentsâ€™ activities: Stress in adolescent behaviors and executive functions. Brain Research, 118, 919â€“927. 47 Various types of brain activity (including muscle strength, attention, learning ability) develop in two stages: the achievement of relative confidence, which leads to the appearance of the first signs of excess energy (this usually precedes the restoration of control over the body) and the development of skills to cope with new problems. All these changes and their duration vary with age. Upon reaching the emotional and physical threshold of development, adults show a greater level of anxiety, and later a feeling of high vulnerability. At the same time, infants, adolescents and young adults achieve greater inner balance, leading to improved stress management and future-related worries. Both stages of development are what we call "age changes." See the next section for the factors that determine these changes. 48 Gilbert, S. (2009).
