Canopy growth pattern of rice and its influence on nitrogen accumulation in plant tissues. We studied the effects of canopy characteristics on nitrogen accumulation in the upper and lower parts of rice plants. Twelve rice cultivars were grown under natural field conditions, and a clear variation in canopy development was found. The growing period of rice was divided into three stages: jointing stage, tillering stage, and growth stage. This development was reflected in morphological characteristics of the canopies. Upper parts of canopies became denser and shorter in the growing stage than the jointing stage, and the lower parts became denser and longer than the tillering stage. Distribution of assimilate in the upper parts of the canopies had a wider distribution than that of lower parts. The distribution of assimilate was significantly affected by the growing stage. In the growing stage, the ratio of total nitrogen in the upper parts to that in the lower parts of the canopy was significantly lower than that in the jointing stage and that in the tillering stage. These results suggested that the distribution of assimilate and the amount of nitrogen were related to canopy growth pattern and that the distribution of assimilate influenced the nitrogen partitioning.[Biomarkers in the diagnosis and prognosis of myocardial infarct]. On the basis of a literature review and personal experiments we discuss the role of the biochemical marker troponin as an early marker of myocardial infarction, and its prognostic significance. Troponin has the advantage over EC
