The utility sports a clean and simple interface that gives users the possibility to perform most operations with just a few clicks. The gadget displays the time and current date, and lets you launch a Google search operation directly from its panel. What's more, you can send emails to your friends with a link from where the utility can be downloaded, as well as rate or share the widget on different online social networking services (e.g. Twitter, Facebook). Nice Clock doesn't come packed with many configuration settings of its own, and for this reason even rookies can make the most out of every single built-in feature. Other options allow users to make the gadget remain on top of other utilities, select the opacity level, opt for a small or large size, as well as move the tool to any area of the desktop. During our testing we have noticed that Nice Clock carries out the searching process very quickly and without errors throughout the entire process. As it would be expected from such a small utility, it remains light on system resources, so it doesn't hamper computer performance, nor interfere with other programs' functionality. All things considered, Nice Clock proves to be a simple desktop enhancement utility that seems to be the right choice for users who are looking for an easy-to-use tool without many dedicated parameters. It can be configured and installed by all types of users, regardless of their experience level. Nice Clock Description: Easy installation and no options to configure, just click and it is installed. If you've ever wondered why you often see astronauts eating their food so early on space flights, it turns out that their stomachs really need to keep their systems running smoothly in space. Astronauts can only hold their bodies weight in their stomachs for a few weeks, so much of what they eat must be broken down and converted to sugar in their liver. But, their brown and white blood cells need to stay well fed if they are to keep watch over the entire body to fight off disease. The amount of nitrogen found in food and the volume of food astronauts eat must be in just the right proportion to provide enough nitrogen to their cells to keep them healthy, but still provide them with enough oxygen to last them until they reach earth. The problem with NASA was that it needed to develop a new type of astronaut food that would keep them healthy and happy for the long-term while still surviving the long journey. Space food was an important consideration in that it would be space food. It had to fit into a small space, and it had to taste good. There are four major steps that need to be taken when building an astronaut's food. First, you have to start with a basic diet for the entire crew. For the regular crew who were going to spend their entire mission in space, this meant a calorie-restricted food. Astronauts live on a 1000 to 1200 calorie per day diet. Imagine it takes 2000 calories just to maintain the human body. Astronauts burn a lot more calories than that, and they need much less. So, 1,000 calories is plenty to live on for a whole month. They need to be able to live on that for
