If we had to name the one defining factor of this decade it would be The Return Of Ham Radio. The Internet changed everything. It facilitated the advent of social networking sites like MySpace, Twitter and YouTube. But it also changed the way we communicate by taking away the need for traditional telephones. For the most part, we can now text, email, IM, tweet and chat with anybody in the world. But when it comes to speaking to people, the main options are still the traditional ones: phone, landline, or mail. But the traditional telephony infrastructure has seen better days. In much of the world, traditional telephony has been a thing of the past. In rural areas of the U.S. and other parts of the world, the traditional infrastructure is lacking. And as those traditional systems become more antiquated, the need for a new technology emerges, just like ham radio did in the early 1900's. We may not be communicating with Mars, Venus and Jupiter, but we are communicating with the other side of the street, with the next town over and with other parts of the country. We're taking to the airwaves, back to analog and back to being the communication tool from the early days of ham radio. Tuning your radio is like "reconnecting" to a past era. But your radio hasn't gone away. You can tune to a beautiful AM channel in rural parts of the country where the old infrastructure still exists. And there's even digital radio and Internet radio. It's all there for you. The new innovations and creativity that we see with social networking sites isn't the only innovation driving new 09e8f5149f
