I recently got a call from a client, who's domain controller was giving them trouble. The DC was a Windows Server 2008 R2 Standard Edition Server, running the latest version of AD DS (AD DS 2003 Domain Functional Level). They were having problems, including: Users authenticating properly, and were unable to access certain resources The DC was not responding to RPC requests I took over the server, and found some potential issues: Computer joined the domain with an incomplete SID The AD DS database was corrupted I fixed the SID, and the AD DS database, and was able to join the server to the domain. Question: It is best practice to have all domain controllers (DCs) in GMS for redundancy, and/or performance reasons? I would think that, if a DC is giving problems, it should be taken out of the domain, and replaced. A: My answer will be based on the operating system you are using. Windows Server 2008, Windows Server 2012 and newer operating systems have many tools that can be used to assist you in AD troubleshooting. Windows Server 2008 If your DC is functioning properly, but you cannot join any Domain Controllers to it, then there are at least 2 issues: When you join the DC to the domain, the DC needs to come online and be able to 1d6a3396d6
