The Lübeck Foundation has awarded the TiHo Foundation a grant of €250,000 to enable TiHo to carry out its project on research on the psychological mechanisms underlying health inequalities. The grant, which runs from 1 January 2013 to 31 December 2014, was awarded by the Foundation on the basis of its successful submission. The TiHo Foundation is a non-profit independent private foundation that underlines education and research in the fields of psychiatry and neurology, provides research funds for university and non-university medical and social science institutions as well as for scientific projects. This is the first time that the Lübeck Foundation has awarded a grant to the TiHo Foundation for a research project. Working with a study of 100,000 Danes, TiHo is examining whether the hypothesis of well-being relating to early life circumstances can be supplemented in future studies with the concept of psychological coping. This will help to better understand how people coping with stressful experiences can in principle prevent the possibility of developing long-term health problems. The project aims to collect health data from Denmark – for example when it comes to the number of hospitalisations, cancer diagnoses, diabetes and high blood pressure – and complement it with data on early life circumstances and personality. These data will then be used to study how health is linked to personality and early life circumstances. “We often have the sense that ‘life throws us challenges’, but we are not always able to deal with them in a positive way. That is why we are conducting the project TiHo. – says project leader Dr Petra Middelboe Christensen, who has a doctorate in clinical psychology at the University of Copenhagen, as well as a postdoctoral position at University Hospital of Lü 3e33713323
