More Information. Some links. The present invention relates generally to an image sensor, and more particularly to a method and apparatus for calibrating color misregistration in an image sensor. Image sensors are prevalent in the semiconductor industry as a sensing device. A variety of image sensors are available, including charge coupled devices (CCD), complementary metal oxide semiconductor (CMOS), micro-electro-mechanical systems (MEM), and the like. In general, the quality of an image outputted from an image sensor depends on the quality of the image sensor itself and the quality of the processing units used for image processing. In order to capture a high-quality image, a number of processing units and electronic circuits are required. A typical image sensing system may include an image sensor, an analog-to-digital converter (ADC), an analog memory, a digital memory, a signal processor, a variety of control circuits and buffers, a flash memory, a digital-to-analog converter (DAC), and other related hardware components. In practice, there are usually misregistrations between the analog signal from the image sensor and the digital signal from the ADC. The misregistration may be caused by different temperature conditions, manufacturing process variations, and the like. For example, the aperture width and the thickness of the semiconductor substrate may affect the performance of an image sensor. Even if the image sensor is made using the same manufacturing process, the performance may be different due to different temperature conditions. Calibration of a misregistration between an image sensor and ADC may be required to improve the image quality. Various methods for calibrating a misregistration between an image sensor and an ADC have been proposed. However, these methods may be problematic. For example, the conventional methods may perform the calibration once during the manufacturing of the image sensor. However, a full calibration of a misregistration between the 1cb139a0ed
