On Monday, after seeing the doctor who did the surgery, the hospital learned Mr. Ciprian had had the operation in the Bahamas. He learned about the surgery when he went to the Bahamas last month to visit family, and the doctor there was unaware of any insurance, he said. Mr. Ciprian was shocked and angry that a simple problem had been left unattended. “What if it had been something more serious?” he asked. “It’s not right that you get operated on by someone in another country and you don’t know what’s going on.” Patients sometimes have their bills sent to the billing office at a hospital where they have been treated, but that practice has grown rare. Hospitals charge patients who do not have insurance and who are uninsured, or who pay with what is called “cash and carry” — out of their own pocket. Most of the uninsured are poor. But some insurers, particularly those that cover only some procedures and drugs, have been imposing limits on payments in response to costs that rose dramatically with the recession.
