What's new in Achievement Lurker: Dad Jokes:

Last year, our friends at GamerTagMoms did a mother and son series called Achievement Lurkers. They focused a great deal on the reasons parents' achievements in video games are basically invisible to their children, and the reasons children hang out on achievement-based achievement lists. In a review of the series, David Lim referred to his father as a "prominent achievement lurker" (a pet name "Jelson" reserves for himself). He wondered if it was a cause for alarm or annoyance at home. Mr. Lim writes, "I always fell pretty hard into the praising and counter-praising of achievements, but my daughter didn't have as much of an interest in learning about what exactly I've been doing on any given level-up, loot or achievement in a given context before she was four." He concludes, "It wasn't until she was around age five that I had a decent moment of noticing exactly how much time I spent on MMOs like WoW and Eve-Online." I called him the other day because I couldn't remember if I'd ever called my dad an achievement lurker to his face, but that Mom had. So I reminded him and said, "And your friends refer to you as a successful achievement lurker. I kind of feel like my dad whenever I write a post about a series of in-game achievements that was published in 2010 or so, but nobody pays much attention." Mr. Lim gives back right on cue. "The truth is," he writes, "while that's a thing and I am someone who often spends an inordinate amount of time on achievement lists, it never really used to bother me if you saw it at home or on your own personal list. My kids grew up loving games and I never really thought of my achievements as being any different. It wasn't until I started playing with my middle daughter this summer that I ever really looked at how much time I'd devoted to WoW and how much time I'd put into other larger processes like social networking, commenting on blogs, and taking long time vacations. When these things started becoming more part of my activities as a father and husband, I started to realize that it was time for a change." "It was while I was playing a preview build of the Ludonarrative Diversion project," he continues, "that I started to learn that my playing time wasn't just part of my hobbies (and
