This list includes common and widespread genera that are represented by native and non-native species. While not an exhaustive list, it does include some important genera that are widespread in South Australia. This list is based on the list compiled by the Australian Plant Census. There is no attempt to distinguish between two species that are known to be similar to one another. Many genera have one or more species that are restricted to areas with restricted resources, such as only found in mallee or escarpment eucalypt woodlands. Each genus may have several associated genera, many of which are very rare. The table below indicates the number of known and rare species within the genus. Rare species, as defined by the Australian Plant Census, are those that are restricted to an area smaller than 10 km². These species may be found in restricted environments, in which case they are often unique to a small area. Most of the species are not necessarily restricted to the listed environments. The location of the species can be found by clicking on the links.
