Just one week after the huge success of "Batman Begins", director Christopher Nolan and Warner Bros. is already looking forward to the sequel, "The Dark Knight", being released this summer. The same team has been tasked with the second part of this big-budget trilogy, including director of photography and regular second unit director of photography Wally Pfister. After only a few days of filming in London, Pfister shared with the Polish Cinesite the stunning behind-the-scenes images of Gotham City in mid-winter, beautifully lit by the city's mesmerizing street lamps and neon light signage. They're not going to come as a surprise to the fanatic audience of this film, as the same can be seen in the trailer. It's truly breathtaking, as Pfister has always been. "When I go to a location, for me, it's a moment of elation, and so to have the 'Batman Begins' city in front of us with these sort of traditional street lighting and the London architecture just working so perfectly with the action, I knew it was going to make a great image to work with," Pfister said. The director acknowledged that the preparation was the biggest challenge during the shooting of the movie - and that it was very different from any of the previous movies he worked on. "That's
