Cancer incidence among Puerto Rican men and women in Puerto Rico: an exploratory study. Using data from the Puerto Rico Cancer Registry and socio-demographic data, a retrospective study was carried out to evaluate the occurrence of cancer among men and women residing in Puerto Rico. The overall annual cancer rates (World Standard Population) among men were 682.9 (51.3%) and among women 370.2 (28.0%) and the age-adjusted annual rates per 100,000: men 527.5 (55.4%) and women 286.6 (27.5%). The overall cancer incidence in Puerto Rico exceeded the U.S. averages and this study shows that for all cancers combined and for cancers of the prostate, lung, and breast among women, the rates in Puerto Rico are above the U.S. level. For men, the rate for prostate cancer is higher than the U.S. level, and for lung, breast, and pancreatic cancer the rates are also higher than the U.S. averages. With regard to cancer incidence among men and women, the data analysis indicates significant differences between men and women.

A vector for controlling retrovirus infection in hematopoietic stem cells. We show here that the activity of the SFFV (Spleen focus-forming virus) retroviral vector can be exploited for the development of a method for transducing murine hematopoietic stem cells. The SFFV vector can be used to induce the expression of a marker which facilitates identification and purification of transduced cells. These markers can be in the form of proteins or peptides expressed by the cells as a consequence of the transcription of the retroviral vector. Thus, no stable cell lines will be obtained for the expression of the marker. The experiments reported here suggest that, given the transduction rate, the purification of the progenitor cells on the basis of the marker will be a feasible strategy.
