Three transport processes by which the cell may regulate its intracellular pH have been demonstrated to operate in human erythrocytes: Na+/H+ exchange, Cl-/HCO3- exchange and Na+/Cl- exchange. These are used to maintain an average intracellular pH of 7.3 in the presence of a physiological Na+ gradient. They are regulated by changes in the cell volume, possibly by the H+-ATPase. Both the Na+ gradient-dependent Cl-/HCO3- exchange and Na+/Cl- exchange are maximally activated between pH 6.8 and 7.2 and the intracellular Cl- concentration remains below 2 mmol/kg dry weight. The pH-sensitivity of both processes is influenced by cAMP, which is inhibitory at physiological concentrations and stimulatory at saturating concentrations. The Cl-/HCO3- exchange is inhibited by furosemide, bumetanide and azide. It is activated by serine-threonine kinase and inhibited by the serine-threonine kinase inhibitor peptide. It is greatly enhanced by the presence of glutathione or by the mutation of Thr455 in the beta subunit of the Na+/K+ pump to alanine. There is little transport of either glutamine or asparagine, but both oxyanions are transported at higher concentrations in methanesulphonic acid.Q: Как в Windows 7 и 8 в регулярном выражении добавить пробел перед и в конце Как в Windows 7 и 8 в регулярном выражени
