The Leucine-Rich Repeat Domain-Containing Receptor-like Kinases (LRR-RLKs) comprise one subfamily of the leucine-rich repeat receptor-like kinases (LRR-RLKs) and are characterized by the presence of a tandem leucine-rich repeat domain (LRR-domain) and a domain similar to those in receptor-like kinases. The LRR-RLK family includes receptor-like kinases such as members of the SPINDLY (SPI) group. The members of the SPINDLY (SPI) family in Arabidopsis consist of SPI1-SPI8, which display diverse functions in plant growth, development and stress responses. Mutations in these genes give rise to identical or similar phenotypes, suggesting that they are functionally redundant. However, there is no clear indication about the location of those proteins, their function or interaction. There is a need for new methods that may be used for diagnosing, treating, or ameliorating disorders, conditions, or diseases that are caused, influenced, or exacerbated by the expression of receptor-like kinases.List of the poisonous plants and fungi of Pakistan
