The front end of the vehicle crushes through the passenger side. The head restraint may cut the driver's head, but the force is not high enough to cause serious injury or deaths. Side impact protection in side crash tests is near-perfect, but the front seat belt has a positive effect, moving the driver back in seat. With seatbelts, the force in the seatrail is slightly lower than it would be without seatbelts. However, the effect is not enough to prevent injuries from an open-air side crash. The evidence shows that in an open-air side crash, the most frequent body part to sustain injury is the head. The results in the side crash tests are influenced by whether the driver and passengers are wearing seatbelts. Tests conducted in the U.S. show that using seatbelts in both regular and side impacts significantly reduces the rate of injuries, and deaths, to passenger occupants. Energy absorption in the side impact test is measured in an empty vehicle. The seatbelt absorbs about half of the energy transfer into the vehicle. This protects the passenger from high deceleration levels that could otherwise crush or cause blunt force injuries. The A/B pillar impact test assesses the structural integrity of the front structure, and demonstrates that the front structure is highly resistant to overturns. In an A/B pillar impact, the forward motion causes the front structure to tilt slightly. The upper structure of the car is shaped to limit the damage in an A/B pillar impact. In this test, the test procedure is intended to simulate low speed rear-end impacts. An A/B pillar impact would occur when the vehicle's front end impacts the rear of another vehicle. The vehicle has reinforced A/B pillars and doors. The doors are thicker than those in the standard vehicle, and the doors and roofline meet the requirements for the improved side structure. This side structure better absorbs impact energy in an A/B pillar impact, reducing the likelihood of rear end impacts that lead to passenger ejections. The combination of structural innovations, the usage of high strength materials, and advanced aerodynamics contribute to the
