Image editors and RAW conversions Photoshop requires the conversion of a RAW image into a TIFF file before you can use it. JPEG files (the file format most people shoot in) are not as good at handling the wide range of colors of the raw sensor data from the camera; therefore, we recommend that you convert your raw image to a TIFF file format before you work on it. The newer Aperture can open and work on a RAW file directly without first converting it. Aperture includes a powerful toolkit for working with digital RAW files known as `_siggraph_ _plug-ins_`. You can read more about siggraph plug-ins at the end of this chapter. Adobe calls these tools `_digital effects_` or `_image effects_`. Most of the time, the image editor tools are much more powerful and versatile than the siggraph plug-ins. ## Adobe Lightroom Adobe

Q: Map used on rails 3.2 In my index.html.erb file i have the following code: when i insert the following HTML into the html.erb file: Why does rails ignore the line the second time? A: The map method is an instance method of ActiveSupport::HashWithIndifferentAccess - it takes an argument, key, and returns the value of the key for that hash. If you call map it returns an array: irb> map(:color,'red').class => Array irb> map.class =>

HashWithIndifferentAccess You could call it as a class method, but it won't affect what you get back: irb> class.map(:color,'red').class => Array or if you use map in a view, you can get what you want: The first snippet is equivalent to The second to 150
