The U.S. Senate's move to save net neutrality rules is a coup for net neutrality advocates, but the road ahead is likely to be complicated. By Ron Scherer, Special to The Christian Science Monitor / September 14, 2015 ANALYSIS: No Net Neutrality Without Title II? The U.S. Senate's move to save net neutrality rules is a coup for net neutrality advocates, but the road ahead is likely to be complicated. The U.S. Senate's move to save net neutrality rules is a coup for net neutrality advocates, but the road ahead is likely to be complicated. In a long-awaited procedural vote last week, the Senate approved a resolution reclassifying internet service as a telecommunications service, thereby allowing the Federal Communications Commission to "forbid" broadband providers from "blocking, slowing down or interfering with your internet connection," so long as they also follow "reasonable" non-discrimination rules. The vote to repeal Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934, which has been virtually deactivated since its 2010 reclassification as Title I under then-President Barack Obama, represents a major victory for net neutrality supporters, including the FCC and the broadband industry. Yet the legislative route to undo the Title II decision remains equally important for a number of stakeholders, including large ISPs that seek to broaden the debate over net neutrality. Without an act of Congress to overturn Title II, rules put in place by the FCC could be frozen, with the agency accused of having overstepped its authority. "Until there is a permanent fix for Title II, there is no net neutrality," says Gigi Sohn, a former chief counsel at the FCC and president of the progressive public interest group Public Knowledge. Today, the FCC's Chairman Tom Wheeler could lift the rules, paving the way for ISPs to block, throttle, prioritize, or otherwise manipulate traffic. But the agency would then be left to defend its authority to regulate internet service, and the courts would be left

At the end of the video, we try to find out the individual security of Half Life products, and why people are demanding to have Half Life 4. In this episode I go into the early days of the FPS genre. I talk about the first few years of Half-Life, Counter-Strike, and Doom. The first time I played Doom was when I was around ten years old. I actually had to rewrite my memory of Doom because, like many players, I found the game too easy when I first picked it up. Many years later I went on to work at a game studio where we had our own custom version of Doom, so I got to experience the game from a lot of different perspectives. In contrast, I got into the FPS scene when Half-Life came out, so I wasn't as familiar with earlier shooters, like the original Quake and its first sequel. Plus, I liked the idea of using another character as your character instead of your typical first-person shooter. I always wanted to make videos about games, but I figured I needed to get some sort of schooling first and get a few years of experience under my belt before I started making video series. I started working at my game studio after college, and I was able to make all the connections I needed, including the people in the industry that could help me. I had first found work at a game studio
