It is already available for both Windows and Mac OS X; you can download it for free and lib-0036{ref-type="ref"} which is consistent with a recent finding that disease resistance is associated with increased uptake and translocation of iron from the lamina into the chloroplast (Ulvinen et al., [2016]{#pld365-bib-0035}{ref-type="ref"}). These same studies suggest that the increase of iron concentration and the accumulation of chlorophyll are connected to each other and it is quite possible that AtFRO3 regulates the amount of iron in the chloroplast by controlling ferritin expression, since ferritin is known to be associated with high iron uptake and tolerance (Ishimaru, Tanigaki, Kojima, & Fukuda, [2005]{#pld365-bib-0011}{ref-type="ref"}; Sainsbury et al., [2014]{#pld365-bib-0026}{ref-type="ref"}). This could be tested by analysis of these reporter lines for increased iron concentration and tolerance. There are several RNAi and overexpression lines available (AtFerroportin-RNAi, AtFER) that are still in an early stage of characterization and require
