Upregulation of Apelin/APJ system in chronic hyperhomocysteinemia. Plasma homocysteine has been associated with various diseases. The aim of this study was to determine whether chronic hyperhomocysteinemia affects the expression of apelin/APJ system in myocardium and its impact on heart failure (HF) and its mechanism. Wistar rats were randomly divided into groups: control (n=8), homocysteine-treated control (n=8), HF (n=12) and homocysteine-treated HF (n=12). Serum homocysteine, apelin, APJ and their receptors (APJ-R), telomerase reverse transcriptase (TERT) and survivin were assessed. Myocardium tissue homocysteine, apelin, APJ-R and TERT were evaluated and apoptosis was measured by TUNEL staining. Apelin, APJ-R, telomerase, survivin, and apoptotic index were significantly higher in homocysteine-treated control group compared to the control group. Apelin, APJ-R and TERT were upregulated by homocysteine in HF group compared to the control and homocysteine-treated control groups. Apelin, APJ-R, and TERT were upregulated in homocysteine-treated HF group compared to the HF and homocysteine-treated control groups. Apelin and APJ-R were not significantly different between HF and homocysteine-treated control groups.
