twin-engined strategic bombers I do not think so. The L-39 flight lasted and no ground support was needed. The video was taken by combat camera, not BVR (beyond visual range). Russia is still busy at building the BUK-3/SAM-9/R-27 (or "R-73") anti-aircraft missile system which is meant to defend against bombers and the L-39 (it cannot defend against cruise missiles!). It is an accurate anti-aircraft system, not meant to reach a glancing blow. If it will crash or you think it will drop a bomb or you'll need to fire more cannon rounds because of an unclaimed rocket or missile, fire!" "Battle of Kuban" In the summer of 1942, Operation Barbarossa, the first large-scale military offensive of the Third Reich, was unfolding. The Red Air Force (RKKA) was trying to defend their country's southwestern (today, northern) front and provide assistance to our troops. That area of front was known as the Kuban, part of the Don steppe of Russia. Imagine the Battle of Stalingrad + Northfield Minnesota (having it exactly the same w/o the Northfield Minnesota part) + Nagorno-Karabakh = Kuban battles. The Germans managed to intercept a large number of the Soviet aircraft and used them to great effect at the Battle of Kuban. Here is a segment from a film made about the battle: At a certain moment, a Soviet AS-21-A2 twin-engine bomber appeared nearby. The L-39 was in direct collision course, flying low and fast. The pilot should either have veered away, made a circle and come in for a new attack, or allow the plane to collide. But, the pilot gave the bomber some space and he steered away from him. During that moment, the Russian pilot yanked the stick
