a review strategy to single out 24 pre-selected bots. With our little sketchy algorithm we'll check the faq question; Are you a bot. It's not all that complicated or hard to understand. What we try to do is determine which questions a bot is trying to reply to the FAQ, then analyze and see if it's human. We already have the code written to do this, our goal is to actually implement it. How? Sounds easy, but it hasn't been as easy as it sounds, I'll explain why in a moment. Anyone who thinks this is spamming will have their first incriminating think wrong, all it actually wants is a real chat. But we already have all the information we need to find out if it's humans or bots. If it's humans it's not going to do anything but respond to the messages we send it with random messages. If it's bots it will be spamming and sent more spam to other bots. Now we know this is not going to be spam, it's actually going to be a chat we've already setup. Why? We don't have to setup a chat, we can let the user their own chat. That would take time to setup, so instead the chat is already programmed into the process, we are simply checking if it's being hosted by a bot, then we're checking if the messages are stuff the bot already said or not, which we can do with the information we received, plus we can eliminate users we already have setup a chat with and only monitor those who don't. We should say something is added to the bot experience, such as the bot should already know what happens if they chat with an admin. This is implemented already in our code, but this is the priority right now, then we can worry about implementing the easiest part. Our algorithm works in the following way, we've set up a number of bots with data, we've logged the chat they asked a question in and we've checked if the received message matches the bot response. Once we find a bot we'll remove it and replace with our own, if this is going to be human friendly, we'll allow him to continue to chat with other users, if not, he'll be removed. Another condition, this is the

The game is extremely deep, and honestly, very difficult to understand (at least by most people). However, if you like visual novels, I highly recommend this game. The storyline is complete, if you can't catch up in the first playthrough, don't worry. You'll start to understand much more with time.
