Q: Integral of power of operator I'm trying to figure out how to evaluate this integral, can someone explain why I should put the exponentials in exponential form or how I would do it?

$$\int_{-\infty}^{\infty} e^{e^{-x}} e^{e^{-x}} dx$$

A: You can't directly interchange the integral and the function. Instead, you can use the fact that $\int_{-\infty}^{\infty} f(x)g(x) dx = \int_{-\infty}^{\infty} f(x) \left(\int_{-\infty}^{\infty} g(y) dy \right) dx$ Now, we have that $f(x) = e^{e^{-x}}$ and $g(x) = e^{e^{-x}}$. $\int_{-\infty}^{\infty} f(x) g(x) dx = \int_{-\infty}^{\infty} e^{e^{-x}} e^{e^{-x}} dx$ Using integration by parts, we get: $\int_{-\infty}^{\infty} f(x)$

The higher speed GaAs diodes make possible a number of commercially attractive products. The higher speed GaAs diodes are capable of providing communication services for the non-earth orbiting world in the television and information fields and in the space field. Similarly, the higher speed diodes are capable of providing a number of commercial products in the automobile and elsewhere. One example of a new category of products using high speed, GaAs diodes is the development of new device technologies on gallium arsenide to compensate for the low transmission loss in the silicon technology. For example, the silicon devices are very linear and require a number of diodes to compensate for the low transmission loss. Another area where GaAs diodes have an advantage over silicon diodes is that the GaAs diodes can be fabricated on semiinsulating or n-type GaAs or any combination of n-type and semiinsulating GaAs substrates. The silicon technology requires an n-type silicon substrate in order to prevent collection of minority carriers. Since the n-type silicon substrates are expensive, the use of n-type GaAs substrates would make the GaAs diodes much less expensive. A GaAs diode produced on an n-type GaAs substrate is an open-base diode and unlike a conventional diode has a relatively low leakage current. Typical conventional GaAs diode
