Perception and Responsible Eating Behaviors Related to Vegetable and Fruit Intake in Elementary-Grade Students. Most children in the United States fail to meet fruit and vegetable intake recommendations and are thus at risk for health problems later in life.

Evidence-based strategies, which include parental involvement, are needed to prevent unhealthy dietary behaviors and inform the development of better nutrition policy. The purpose of this study is to examine perceptions and responsible eating behaviors related to fruit and vegetable intake among elementary school students. This is a cross-sectional survey of students in grades K-5 (N = 373) to determine the relationship between perceived barriers, perceived benefits, and responsibility to eat healthful and unhealthful foods. Bivariate analysis showed that students who perceived barriers to healthful eating had more unhealthful eating behaviors than those who perceived no barriers. Students who perceived barriers to unhealthful eating had less unhealthful eating behavior compared with those who perceived no barriers. Subgroup analysis indicated that fruit and vegetable intake was significantly higher in students with action plans. This study highlights the importance of a multidisciplinary approach to chronic disease prevention in the elementary school years.
