The effects of chronic administration of carbamazepine, phenytoin, primidone, and ethosuximide (100, 200, and 400 mg/kg/day, po) on kindling were studied. By periodic testing, rats were divided into placebo- and drug-treated groups. On days 14 and 28, latency of the first phase of kindling was decreased, while the number of afterdischarges between the two stimulation sessions was increased. Repeated administration of carbamazepine, phenytoin, and ethosuximide (400 mg/kg/day, po) increased the number of afterdischarges between the two sessions of stimulation and increased the number of afterdischarges per afterdischarge of the first session of kindling, indicating an increase in seizure activity. The present data indicate that chronic treatment with carbamazepine, phenytoin, and ethosuximide has potential antiseizure activity.Last week, we reported on how China has become the world leader in mass domestic production of ultra 50b96ab0b6
