Cell & Molecular Biology Paperback by De Robertis, Lea and Febiger) At the end of the day, "just say thank you" is your job. The best you can do is simply accept the random acts of kindness with gratitude and sincere thanks. Also, let those whom you might be offended by know that you are actually really thankful that they thought to try. If nothing else, you'll have an answer that satisfies your curiosity and will appease the person you might offend. (Conversation will not ensue.) At the end of the day, "just say thank you" is your job. The best you can do is simply accept the random acts of kindness with gratitude and sincere thanks. Also, let those whom you might be offended by know that you are actually really thankful that they thought to try. If nothing else, you'll have an answer that satisfies your curiosity and will appease the person you might offend. (Conversation will not ensue.) If you don't answer it to their satisfaction, it's not their fault. You want to make sure you really understand what they are saying. Because they may be trying to tell you that they felt like giving it to you. There is a huge difference between that and wanting to give it to you to prove they are "better" than you. The fact that no one has answered you by now is something that might be concerning because they don't want to hurt you further. They are just not good at expressing themselves. They can't respond to your comment because they didn't have a chance to read it. Personally, I don't think we should give a shit about what we say to each other. What do people care whether someone else enjoys their food or not? Some things are just rude to say to the person serving you. You're not going to see a menu listing of "Don't say this to the server." Heres how I deal with this: The time an establishment serves me a dish or refills my water, I simply say thanks. Sometimes the servers are awesome and are really just trying to make things easier on you. I always take the time to go through my entire server experience and look for something I could have done or said to make their job easier. Never be rude. If you have to, start saying "You are so nice to serve...", or "Thanks so much for
