The use of ladders is widespread in both residential and commercial buildings. Many ladders are provided with a safety latch or locking mechanism to prevent a person from being injured or falling off the ladder. Such mechanisms are typically inexpensive and add little to the structural integrity of the ladder. However, many of the ladders in residential homes are not provided with a safety latch and, consequently, unauthorized persons can easily remove them from the home and place them at inappropriate locations. As a result, such ladders are typically left in the open. Accordingly, there is a need for a ladder locking mechanism which will prevent a person from being injured or falling off the ladder and which adds little to the cost and structural integrity of the ladder. The present invention provides a ladder locking mechanism for ladders which prevents a person from removing the ladder. The ladder includes a pair of spaced rails with a plurality of rungs secured therebetween. The ladder includes a horizontal side member having a first end with a first end support and a second end having a second end support. The ladder also includes a vertical side member having a
