Organic semiconductors promise versatile and complementary electronic and optoelectronic devices, since they can be formulated as thin-films by printing and coating. To date, the reported large-area fabrication of such flexible devices has been restricted to thick crystalline or amorphous films, which are rigid and brittle, respectively. We demonstrate that organic semiconductors can be printed onto a wide variety of flexible substrates, such as plastic foils and paper, from solution, without the aid of a printing agent. Both semiconducting and conducting solution-processed compounds are used and direct-viewed by the naked eye. By combining the printability, electrical and optoelectronic devices are made on a single substrate, which shows high device yield. The approach is therefore a feasible technique for large-area and flexible solution-processed electronics.The package for this software used the name HADOOP for the installer and version 1.0.0 for the source. It has recently been renamed to HDP and the source code has been moved under that project.
