The primary aim of this research is to analyze, in a large representative sample, the impact of different types of tobacco smoking (smoked, smokeless and other) on the pattern of medical care in India. A secondary aim is to analyze the effect of the "tobacco epidemic" among the various population groups of India, including the agesex composition of disease burden and mortality, and in terms of the productivity of the population. Other aims of this project are to: 1) formulate and run current trends in tobacco control activities in the Indian society and healthcare system; 2) prepare a tobacco cost-benefit analysis for the government; 3) develop procedures for the collection of data on tobacco use in the general population and to collect blood samples for future genetic and biomarker studies; 4) develop the methodology to conduct research on health-related behaviors, including tobacco use, for a large epidemiologic study in India; and 5) serve as a "model" for the Centers for Disease Control in India. This research should yield scientific information that is relevant to all developing countries in Asia where the tobacco epidemic is beginning to have a substantial impact on their healthcare systems and will provide the baseline data needed to monitor the progress and prospects of tobacco control in India. Dental implants are used to support dentures or bridges for supporting fixed or removable prosthodontic appliances on a person's teeth. The dental implants are surgically implanted into the jawbone of a patient using a cutting/drilling instrument to form a bore through the jawbone into which the implant can be permanently attached, for example, by means of brazing, cementing, or by screwing the implant into the
