Russia to buy two new floating coal storage tanks of large size Russia's state-run mineral producer Uralkali has signed an agreement to buy two floating storage tanks of large size, which will be used to store gas condensate from the Sakhalin-1 and Aral Sea gas-condensate fields. The agreement was signed during a meeting of Urakali's board on February 3. The company has agreed to purchase two floating storage tanks of large size for US$51.7 million (R993.1 million). The storage capacity of these two tanks is 15,000 cubic meters. The agreement on the purchase of the flotation storage tanks follows a similar agreement for small-sized storage tanks acquired by the company earlier this year. In December 2013, the Rosneft and Gazpromneft joint venture signed a contract to purchase four floating tanks. They were to be integrated into the infrastructure of Gazpromneft's Aktivneft project in the Yamal region. The floating storage tanks will be used to store gas condensate from the Sakhalin-1 and Aral sea gas-condensate fields. Doppler velocimetry with in situ d-velocity polarization and its use in transmyocardial revascularization. To evaluate the potential of Doppler velocimetry with in situ laser polarization for the detection and characterization of transmyocardial microperforations. Experimental study in two parts: (1) In vitro flow velocity measurements were performed with Doppler velocimetry with laser polarization in three tubes simulating myocardial vessels. Flow profiles in the tubes were assessed by color Doppler flow mapping and by Doppler velocimetry with laser polarization. (2) In a clinical study, 25 patients undergoing transmyocardial revascularization (TMR) were evaluated. The intramyocardial channels were marked by a Doppler velocimetry with laser polarization system and subsequently confirmed by postoperative angiography. In the in vitro study the measurements were performed on a phantom heart model with
