The memory is there—it occupies less than the size of a flash card. But it can grow more than a million times larger. So, what? There's no need to save everything. A scenario for the future of IT training. By Peter Bray Non-descript company in a nondescript area of the United Kingdom. The company has a well-established trainee scheme with a number of trainees, a number of courses, a number of trainers, and a budget of 25,000 Euros per trainee per year. It employs 12 full-time and 12 part-time trainers and no trainers are posted to the course more than two or three times a year. The various courses are offered to IT students through the university as well as through a number of other channels. The company is able to offer its trainers all the resources required to train a large number of trainees. But, No it can't. for it does not have unlimited resources. A training company opens its doors to its newest recruit (or trainee). The firm says, "We have a very generous training scheme. We have never had a trainee quit because we are too generous." The new recruit says, "I would like to join your training scheme for a year. But, do you have unlimited resources?" "We have never had anyone in our scheme who made it to the end of a year before quitting." The new recruit spends a year as a trainee. One day he says to his supervisor, "I would like to stay a little longer. Will you give me a special project?" The supervisor says, "Of course. Just don't get carried away." Months pass. Then one day the new recruit says to his supervisor, "I have always wanted to undertake a project." "Will you do it?" asks the supervisor. "I would love to be able to do a project. But, do you have unlimited resources?" "We have never had anyone complete a project for us before." The new recruit says, "I can
