Life-history trade-offs of selected Drosophila species in a heterogeneous environment: a comparative test of the 'universal' trade-off hypothesis. Selective forces may drive the evolution of life-history trade-offs within individuals that do not necessarily lower fitness as a whole. In the Drosophila genus, the number of eggs produced by females is correlated positively with the lifespan of offspring. This trade-off has been widely accepted as a universal trade-off, and a trade-off is potentially present even in organisms that do not have a postpollination life cycle such as Drosophila. We show here that the universal trade-off between number of eggs and offspring survival is not universal. The trade-off is universal only in species that have a postpollination life-history cycle, and the costs of breeding and reproductivity can be compensated by a lifespan extension. This trade-off also does not impose any limits on the genetic variation in a population. Under some conditions, only species with a postpollination life-history cycle are able to evolve an increase in fecundity without a cost 6d1f23a050
