The neurologic examination. Nerve conduction studies have many advantages over other available diagnostic methods. This article outlines the reasons why these studies are indicated in a variety of neuromuscular syndromes. It reviews the history, examination, and electrodiagnostic testing principles.

It also contains an illustrated summary of this technology. In addition to motor conduction, studies of sensory conduction are recommended in chronic, inflammatory, and metabolic diseases. However, there is no single electrodiagnostic test that can distinguish accurately all of these conditions. Nerve conduction studies complement other studies for confirmation of a diagnosis. Precocious puberty in an autistic child: a case report. The authors report an unusual case of precocious puberty in a boy with an autistic disorder, which represented an important problem both for the pediatrician and family. A 6-year-old boy presented with short stature and early puberty. His family history was positive for autism and learning disability. At the physical examination, he showed short stature (136 cm), Tanner stage 4.4, pubic hair Tanner stage 3.3 and testicular volume >4 ml. Laboratory investigations revealed normal complete blood count, electrolytes, liver and renal function tests, serum testosterone and luteinizing hormone. Serum gonadotropin was low. No evidence of pituitary or testicular pathology was detected. Abdominal ultrasound detected the presence of a testicular ectopy. He was treated with leuprolide acetate 3.75 mg/mo for 3 months and recovered his normal growth. Subsequently, he was treated with leuprolide
